— “Spirituality” —

Recently, I’ve encountered more than a couple of highly intelligent Millennials who’re fascinated by the notion that we are spiritual beings. They have begun diligently searching for all they can learn about that. Because their research is primarily online, they inevitably find lots and lots of metaphysical philosophy. If you’ve been around that block at least once, you know where the potholes are. They don’t.

The cautions I’ve offered go something like this—

If all my mentors had been Hindu, my faith would likely have lingered in Hinduism until I felt compelled to dig into some serious doubts about it. I’d have studied long and hard enough to have learned everything reasonably possible about it. Only after all that would I have started exploring OTHER faiths.

Why? For starters, I’m quite certain that my brain is way too small to comprehend & assimilate enough beneficial information about MULTIPLE faiths to arrive at a conclusion that’d be worthy of that critical condition called eternity.

Here’s the take-home message I had hoped they’d get—

To embark on a study of multiple faiths without first constructing a solid foundation on the faith that’s right under your nose is asking for confusion. Bet you’ve heard that God is never the author of confusion.

Not convinced that they’ve bought-in to my logic. Suggestions?
